

Model Birt Story

In the story "The Rule of Names" by Ursula K. LeGuin, the character of Birt witnesses a horrible battle between a fierce black dragon and an arrogant visitor to Sattin's Island. Instead of warning the villagers of the danger, Birt frantically collects his love, Palani, and rows away in his boat like a demon. If I had been Birt, I would have done many things differently.

Birt was terrified when he witnessed the transformations of Underhill and Blackbeard. When the lion and tiger first appeared, he was frozen in fear; he couldn't look away. I would have felt panic-stricken watching the two powerful wizards violently battling over the possession of the treasure. I might have fainted from shock when I saw the dragon as big as an airplane.

After Birt opened his eyes to see the hillside empty where the two wizards had fought, he immediately ran to the village, grabbed Palani, jumped in his boat, and left the island. He told no one of the threat of the ferocious dragon which was once Mr. Underhill. If I had been Birt, I would have

The story "The Rule of Names" was creative and interesting, but like many fictional fantasies, not all of the characters' actions were what real people would have done. Birt did things that I would have done quite differently, such as when he I would have I consider myself lucky that I am not Birt. This character's experience was one I would not have enjoyed.
